

Project title: The Use of Architecture for Political Means in the US – A Multi-disciplinary Research Guide and Weblibliography for Scholars

WEBLIOGRAPHY

This weblibliography is intended for researchers interested in the relationship between architecture and politics. In addition to this general perspective, it is intended to support research into the specific issue of the use of architecture as a form of political communication. It is focused on the US but draws on relevant sites whose remit is also international.

Reflecting this general concern and specific sub-focus it includes websites that consider architecture and politics in multiple ways – both general and specific. It also includes sites specialized in political communication. To ensure its accessibility, this resource consists of sites whose resources are freely available and open access.

The selected websites reflect the tendency for web-based sources to focus on current affairs and is composed primarily of contemporary resources. This contemporary focus also reflects the fact that the specific field of architecture and political communication is an emerging area of study. It is presented here in categorized format and keywords are assigned to each website to aid users.
